The 2016 Cornell Summer College brought together a diverse array of bright minds during an always-sunny Ithaca summer.

What fear and anxiety we might have had when we arrived in Ithaca quickly melted away under the unrelenting Big Red sun. During our time together we acquired knowledge, learned skills, made memories, and discovered special places. Most importantly, we formed lasting friendships over every meal at RPCC, every night check we were almost late for, every load of laundry we struggled to carry up from the basement, every crowded hall meeting, and every out-of-stock vending machine.

I hope that we will all look back on these oh-so-special few weeks as some of the best weeks of our lives.

One of the most memorable things for me so far has to do with my class, but it isn’t directly related to it. During a class trip to the Dairy Bar, my professor, Sam Nelson, gave us an unofficial tour of Cornell. He told us some history about the school that I wouldn’t have learned otherwise. He pointed out architectural features that I had passed by and hadn’t thought about. For instance, at the gates to the garden by the Plant Science building, there’s a rather hidden memorial to the old Roberts Hall, which was demolished in the midst of a controversy over its status as a historic building. Also, one of the brains in the brain collection of the Psychology Department belonged to a serial killer. There’s also a particle accelerator under one of the athletic fields, which scientists from all over the world pay thousands to use for a couple hours. It’s incredible. Learning all of this Cornell history was a very memorable part of the program for me, along with the friends that I’ve made and incredible people I’ve met.
